

Heineken's Dating App for Bar Discovery

Published 23 May 2025

Author Julia Jarzabek

Last month global beer brand Heineken unveiled a dating app to match drinkers in Brazil and Italy with new bars. The move comes after a survey commissioned by the brand found that 67% of young adults across the globe tend to stick to the same venue.

According to Heineken's research, Gen Z and millennials have the strongest desire to discover new places, have new experiences and meet new people; however, they struggle to go beyond their comfort zones. Twenty-one per cent are worried about going somewhere they wouldn't like, 18% say it's too hard to please all their friends, and 15% say they're overwhelmed by choice.

These choices have led young people to feel dissatisfied, with 59% admitting that they didn't feel their social life was as rewarding as it could be and 34% wishing that it involved more new experiences. Twenty-three percent of Gen Z respondents even felt that their social lives lack a certain 'spark.'

The company's 'Bar Dating' app aims to bring the spark back by helping consumers expand their social horizons. Based on a format that many young adults are familiar with, the app allows users to 'match with' new venues in their area.

On the app, each bar has its own profile, so consumers can choose a place to match their mood, for instance, a bar with 'laid-back vibes', 'a good sense of humour' or that's 'passionate about live music'.

Aside from encouraging more adventurous in-person socialising, Heineken hopes that the initiative boosts local bar economies as new punters give venues a try.

For more research on Gen Z, including how brands can facilitate new socialising occasions, see, Gen Z Leisure Trends: 25/26. See also Restaurant & Bar Trends: 25/26.